How to Become a Physician

To become a physician, you must first earn a bachelor's degree from an accredited college or university. After completing your bachelor's degree, you must then attend medical school. Medical school is a four-year program that includes both classroom and clinical training.

After graduating from medical school, you must then complete a residency program. A residency program is a period of supervised training in a specific medical specialty. Residency programs typically last from three to seven years.

Once you have completed a residency program, you are eligible to become board certified in your specialty. Board certification is a voluntary process that demonstrates your knowledge and skills in a particular area of medicine.
